Managing Global Changes: Limits to Global Governance of Trade and Investment

Thursday, 2 June 2016 • 10.00–11.00 • Ulika

Keynote Speaker

Dr. Zdeněk Drábek, Charles University in Prague

Globalization is bringing many changes to our lives and many of those changes are channeled through global markets. The debate about global management of international trade and foreign investment in global markets is not about whether but about how trade and investment should be governed. International trade and investment have been primarily managed by rules and disciplines under the protection of international law of the WTO and various types of investment treaties. The system has worked reasonably well but its effectiveness is now threatened. The progress is constrained by problems in three areas – limitations in the coverage and legal interpretations of rules in the existing international trading system, by regionalism and by the controversial and inadequate treatment foreign investment in the current system of international treaties. A progress will require an adaptation by Members to the negotiating agenda of the WTO and, in particular, a recognition that a greater effort must be made to harmonize international rules of foreign investment. The latter will have to find globally acceptable solutions to a number of sensitive issues such as resolution of disputes, treatment of public goods and public policy or an appropriate balance between the rights and responsibilities of home and host countries for foreign investment.

Economic and Social Crisis in the Western Balkans: Neoliberalism in Action

Friday, 3 June 2016 • 11.00–12.00 • Ulika

Keynote Speaker

Dr. Milford Bateman

Visiting Professor, Juraj Dobrila University of Pula, Croatia

St Marys University, Halifax, Canada

Extensive deregulation and de-supervision of the US financial system from the 1980s onwards, coupled to an all-pervading 'greed is good' ambience, gave rise to massive fraud and destructive speculation in the US mortgage, banking and financial services industries (Galbraith 2014). These developments eventually coalesced in 2008 to bring about the partial collapse of the US financial system, and then, as even the London-based Financial Times accepted, the near-meltdown of the entire global financial and banking system shortly thereafter. The economic and social damage arising from this financial sector mayhem has been immense, and it has effectively 'locked in' economic and social crises right around the world, not least in the Western Balkans. The fundamental cause of this immense damage, just as in the 1929 with regard to the Great Depression, was the enforced application of a set of fundamentalist free market myths based around 'efficient markets,' market automaticity and private sector prudent risk-taking, an elite-driven political economy approach otherwise known today as 'neoliberalism.' Yet in spite of its disastrous impact almost everywhere it has been implemented (Amsden 2001; Chang 2007, 2010), abandoning the failed neoliberal policy agenda is not an easy task for governments, as the Greek people know to their immense cost. One reason, as even once mainstream voices now reluctantly accept (Reich 2015), is that global political and financial elites are firmly wedded to the disastrous neoliberal policy agenda out of their own private and national self-interest. The result is that the most powerful international institutions the rich countries effectively control, notably the European Commission and World Bank, alongside many local economists hopeful of a lucrative career in the international development institutions, continue to push for the neoliberal policy agenda irrespective of the enormous damage it has done to developing country economies and societies. Economic crisis in the Western Balkans, and elsewhere, is thus fated to continue until developing country governments find a way to by-pass European Commission and World Bank advice and implement instead an alternative set of 'developmentalist' industrial, financial, enterprise and technology policies based on promoting the sustainable development of their own economies rather than that of the rich developed nations and their large corporations.
